A good training bra should do the following: Provide modesty without overheating. Excess overheating of the tissue can cause an imbalance in your body's hormones. If your breasts can't breathe, you won't be able to do your best. Provide support when you lie down and exercise. A bra that is too tight will restrict the circulation of blood. Circulation is essential for healing, so a bra that constricts your chest may prevent your body from delivering what it needs for optimal recovery. A well-fitting bra should allow you to wear a sports jersey, and maintain ease of movement in your shoulders, neck and back. There is little scientific evidence that supports the idea that bras cause back, shoulder, neck or other injuries. The most common back injury is pulled muscles. Pulled muscles are caused by lifting too much weight too fast, especially in combination with poor posture. At best, bra straps can cause a bit of a tug or irritation, but the effect is barely noticeable or completely invisible. Doctors and nurses have told me that they do not know how common bra-related injuries are. It may be common, but it's certainly not widely discussed. One of the most common reasons for breast augmentation surgery is to reduce back pain caused by tight bras. Many women have told me that their bras are the sole reason for their discomfort after workouts or other activities. Even if you are a bulimic or anorexic, women who have struggled with eating disorders or taking in too much or too little fluid for extended periods of time may have a difficult time recovering from an eating disorder if they have not been properly supported during these periods. Support doesn't have to be just enough to hold up your boobs. My bra size is a 34D, and one of my best friends
